

Glass of Hot Water Before Breakfast a Splendid Habit

Open sluices of the system each morning and wash away the poisonous, stagnant matter.

Those of us who are accustomed to feel dull and heavy when we arise, splitting headache, stuffy from a cold, foul tongue, nasty breath, acid stomach, lame back, can, instead, both look and feel as fresh as a daisy always by washing the poisons and toxins from the body with phosphated hot water each morning.

We should drink, before breakfast, a glass of real hot water with a teaspoonful of limestone phosphate in it to flush from the stomach, liver, kidneys and ten yards of bowels the previous day's indigestible waste, sour bile and poisonous toxins; thus cleansing, sweetening and purifying the entire alimentary tract before putting more food into the stomach.

The action of limestone phosphate and hot water on an empty stomach is wonderfully invigorating. It cleans out all the sour fermentations, gases, waste and acidity and gives one a splendid appetite for breakfast and it is said to be but a little while until the roses begin to appear in the cheeks. A quarter pound of limestone phosphate will cost very little at the drug store, but is sufficient to make anyone who is bothered with biliousness, constipation, stomach trouble or rheumatism a real enthusiast on the subject of internal sanitation. Try it and you are assured that you will look better and feel better in every way shortly.

HEAD STUFFED FROM CATARRH OR A COLD

Says Cream Applied in Nostrils

Personal Side of Young Prince

NEW YORK, Nov. 15.—What impressed Americans most on first sight of the youthful and handsome Prince of Wales as he made his first informal entry to the nation's capitol and then to New York, was his extreme youthfulness and American spirit. Above everything else, His Royal Highness Prince Albert of Wales, the future King of Great Britain, is in almost every respect a prototype of the average young American who likes outdoor sport and an occasional wild spree, and about the only thing that distinguishes the Prince from American college athletes is his lengthy title.

The Prince of Wales is a football fan. He has played football in his native land and he can appreciate rooting at an American game with American variations. It is said that his itinerary of sight seeing in New York City and in other American cities will not be complete without the Prince taking at least one representative college football match.

So marked are these democratic and inherently American tendencies in the royal blood of the handsome prince that already he has been the subject of numerous anecdotes related whenever people of lowly and democratic type gather to discuss topics of timely interest. There is no question that the Prince has made a hit, and it seems that it will take some time before Mr. Jones, the grocer, and Mrs. Smith, the washwoman, will tire chatting about His Royal Highness's democratic qualities and looks.

The Prince is like every American youngster. He is said to be a devoted stamp collector. From his boyhood days he has been a steady and devoted follower of the sciences of Philately, so dear to the heart of every American boy. The Prince has built up a very large collection of postage stamps and he is still ever keen to add to his collection. This fact has just become known here, creating a bit of excitement and exaltation among the local stamp collectors.

There are two men in America, both veteran English postage stamp collectors, who probably know more about the intimate side of the Prince's life than any man here, with the possible exception of the members of the British Diplomatic Corps in Washington. Both represent the largest firm of British stamp dealers.

One is Charles J. Phillips, head of the firm, who is now touring America in search for valuable colonial stamps which the Prince desires to add to his collection. Mr. Phillips holds the royal appointment to the King's household, an honor which is granted only to one tailor, a boot-maker, and several other prominent London merchants. He makes periodical visits to the palace to display his samples to King George and his heir.

"It is generally known that His Majesty King George has been an enthusiastic stamp collector from the days he was a midshipman in the British Navy," Mr. Phillips said, "but probably few in America, or in England proper, are aware that his son, the Prince of Wales, is also a devotee of stamp collecting."

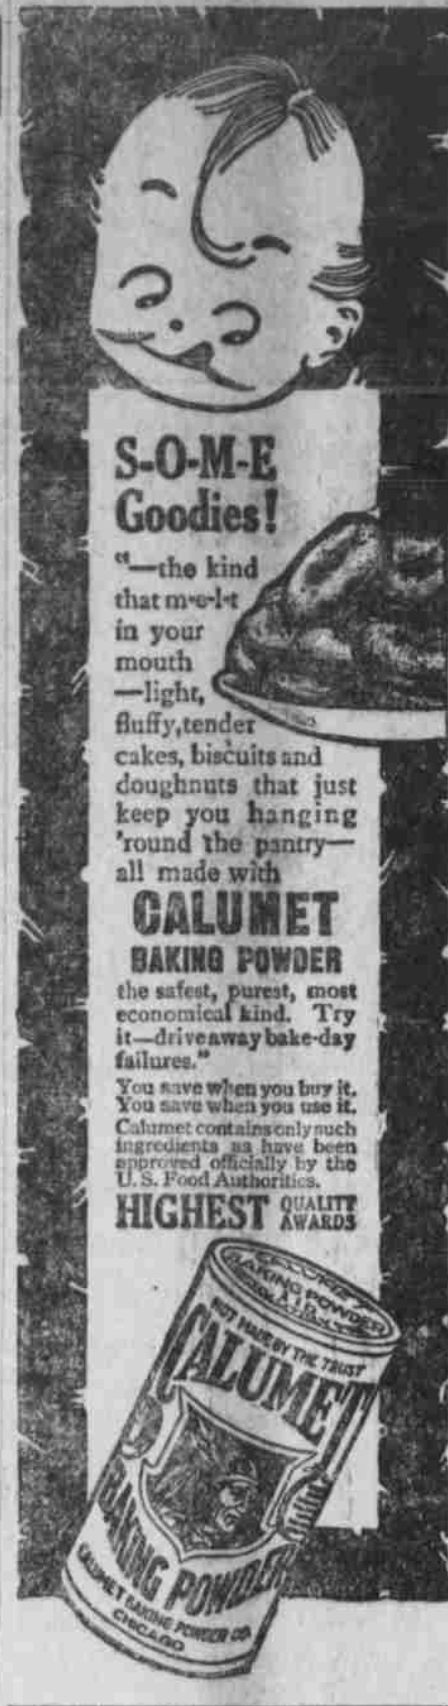

"The Prince commenced to collect stamps when quite a lad, and like most boys he collected everything that looked like a stamp, but as he grew up, and just before he went to Magdalen College, Oxford, he got rid of his stamps of foreign countries and kept these only of Great Britain and all her countries. He now specializes only in this large group of postal issues."

"He has naturally received many of the duplicates from his father's collection, and he has acquired many others by exchange and by purchase. Among other stamps in which he takes special interest we might mention those issued in his native island, Prince Edward Island, to which he has given special study. He is also partial to the older issues of postage stamps of the West Indies, the Cape of Good Hope and others. King George is the patron of the Royal Philatelic Society of London, and the Prince is a member of this organization."

E. B. Powers, American representative of this firm, recalled in an interview the other day when he sold stamps to the young Prince in London.

"The Prince of Wales began stamp collecting when he was but ten years old, which is about the time the average American boy begins to practice the hobby. Mr. Powers recalled, "He made periodical visits to our London shop and it was generally my duty to wait on him."

"He told me that his father allowed him a half a crown a week with which to buy stamps for his collection. The prince used to spend many hours looking over our large collections of postage stamps. As soon as his father gave him his weekly allowance he would hurry down to the stamp shop, often accompanied by his younger brother. I can still remember that he was always on the lookout for three cornered stamps.

"King George's collection of postage stamps is regarded as priceless and consists of only issues of the colonial governments. It has been the custom for the colonial governments to make frequent presentations to the King and Prince of valuable collections of historic stamps, and when these are not forthcoming, they take the trouble to reprint entire issue."

The Prince has his own garret in the Palace, where he spends his leisure hours pouring over his albums, gleaning over his treasures. But be- NO HEAD—TWO . . . G . . . G . . . G . . . sides stamp collecting, the Prince has another hobby, equally dear to the heart of every American boy. He is a devotee of the bicycle, or "bike" as he himself unroyally terms it. Then he loves to row, and when in college he likes to play pranks on his classmates. One of the stories related by Mr. Phillips illustrating the Prince's democratic habits, runs as follows:

On one occasion one of the young sprigs of nobility who was a classmate of the Prince at Oxford, was going off to witness a foot ball match. He offered to take the Prince along in his Rolls-Royce car.

"No, thanks," said the Prince. "I prefer to use my old bike."

On another occasion, Mr. Phillips relates, the Prince invited a group of his Oxford classmates to dine in his rooms at the college, and from there to proceed to the theatre to witness a performance by a company of famous London actors.

Everything went along fine, after dinner the Prince made some sort of excuse to leave his classmates for a moment. An hour passed, but the Prince did not return. Growing anxious about his safety, the guests began a hunt through the college. After an hour of fruitless search, some of them decided to go to the theatre, and there they found the Prince alone in his box, much amused at the way in which he had given them the slip and caused them a bit of uneasiness.

Another anecdote told by the Prince's intimate friends here in characteristic of the youthful daring and frankness, by the way illustrating his popularity with the fair sex, a quality which was developed by his grandfather, King Edward. While in Hamilton, Canada, he recently danced with a Scottish young lady, whose name happened to be MacCushion. She was a very attractive young lady, quite plump and charming, so that it seemed to everybody that the Prince had become particularly infatuated with her, all the more so since he had danced with no one else that evening.

The Prince manifested his affection for the young lady by constantly holding her close during the dances, and very frequently hugging her close to his bosom. Finally, the Miss MacCushion, a bit embarrassed, called this to the attention of His Royal Highness.

"Well, you see," the Prince replied sweetly, "your name is MacCushion, and you were made to be squeezed."

It is generally known that the Prince is also a devotee of flying. It is now being told that during the war the Prince made daily excursions in his flying machine. This fact was kept secret, and no one in London, with the exception of those in the Prince's social set, were aware of this, for it was feared that harm might come to the Prince by making this public. It is said that the Prince is very skillful at the throttle of an aeroplane engine.

"Whom is the Prince going to marry?" is a question frequently asked. Before the war an answer would be very easy, for it was often thought that the Princess of Roumania was the most likely match, but since national relations have been thrown topsy-turvy it has become a difficult problem. But persons who know the Prince intimately declare that he has "decided views" on this matter, and they are that his ideas along this line are quite unconventional and American-like.
